How it was Done: A New Feature

Lupine Impressions by Dick Stahlke

This is a shot done entirely in camera, with the only photoshop editing consisting of cropping and basic image optimization. The technique simply combines a slow shutter with some camera motion, in this case in a diagonal direction back and forth from upper left to lower right. Use as slow a shutter as possible, either by setting the aperture as small as possible or by setting the shutter speed directly. If shooting in bright light, the speed can be slowed by adding a polarizer or neutral density filter. Then, compose the image, add the camera motion, and press the shutter when you have established the rhythm of movement. Only a small amount of camera movement is needed, and best results are usually obtained if you take four to six images and then select the best one. No two images are ever the same. The direction of camera movement will vary the character of the image, and, with practice, you'll discover the best kind of subjects for the technique. Happy shooting!
